WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

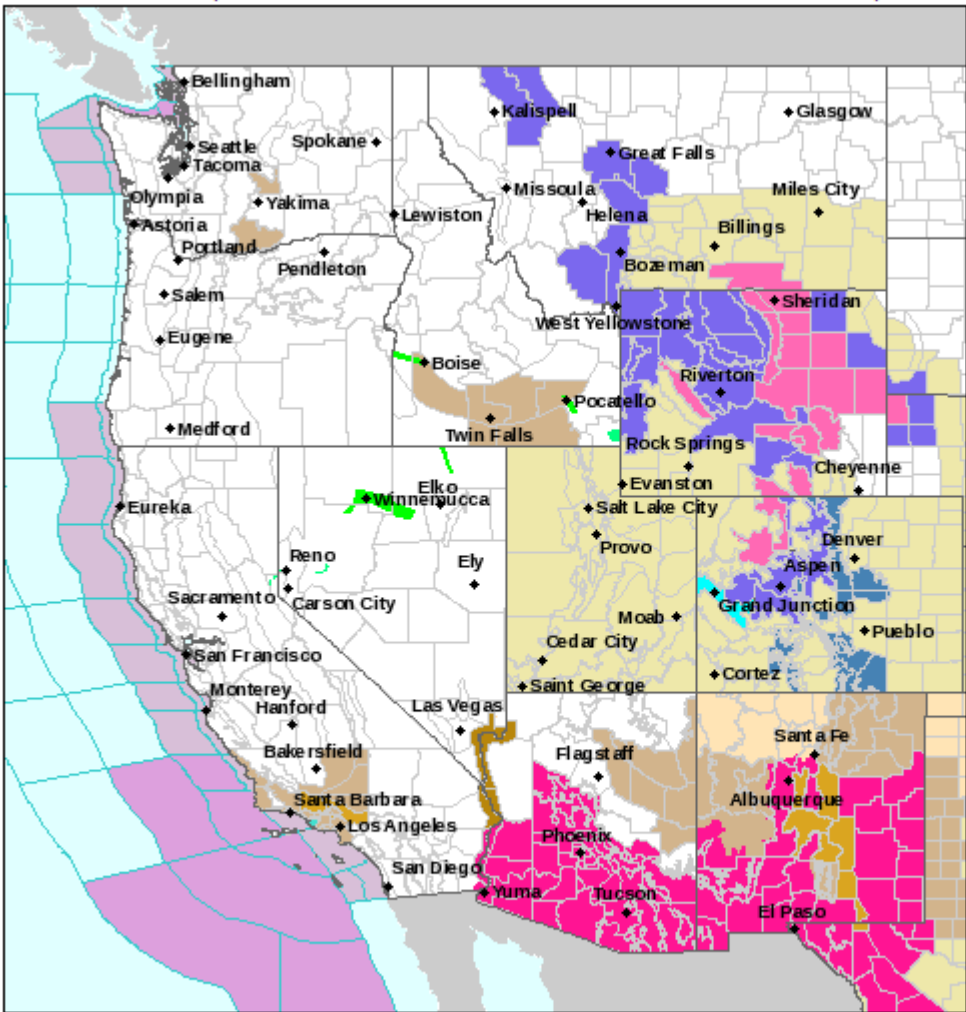

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

Scattered high clouds will still be overhead today but the trend will be for decreasing clouds with warmer and drier conditions as high pressure moves in and produces a northwest to Northeast surface wind pattern. Peak gusts will be early tomorrow, with gusts in wind-prone areas in and around the Sacramento Valley reaching 25-35 mph. The warming and drying trend will continue through the weekend. Temperatures will increase from 1-4 degrees below normal today to 7-10 degrees above normal by Sunday. At this time next week looks mild to warm and mostly dry, but with occasional mountain showers or thunderstorms toward the middle and end of the week.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

At this time, the strongest winds are blowing across the Kern County Mountains eastward into the Antelope Valley where some gusts exceeding 40 mph are occurring. It will continue until this evening with winds remaining quite strong through tonight. It will also be windy along the central coast to Point Conception as well as in the Owens Valley where northwest winds of 20-30 mph. The weather will gradually trend warmer and less windy through Saturday. Most areas will see light winds by the weekend. Temperatures will reach the 90s in the interior valleys by Saturday but another trough may bring a slight amount of cooling Sunday through the first part of next week. Look for temperatures to remain a few degrees above normal Sunday through next Wednesday with highs reaching the 60s in the mountains to the mid to upper 80s at lower elevations with mostly sunny skies. Minimum relative humidity will become significantly lower Friday through the weekend with many areas below 6,000 feet seeing readings in the teens each day for 4-6 hours. But light winds should allow for good recovery each night.
